PEER PRESSURE VS. PARENTAL INFLUENCE

Peer pressure and parental influence shape a teenager's behavior in distinct ways. Peer pressure often pushes individuals to conform to group norms to gain acceptance, sometimes leading to risky behaviors. In contrast, parental influence tends to foster values, discipline, and guidance. While peers affect social interactions and immediate decisions, long-term moral development is usually rooted in parental teachings. The balance between these forces determines a child's personal growth and decision-making abilities. Both can impact their identity and choices significantly.
